Mazower is not unaware of what appears to be neglect of the later twentieth century: 'until very recently historians have mostly left the subject of post-war Western Europe to social scientists. Almost exactly a century before, a meeting of the European states at the Congress of Vienna had established an international order and balance of power that lasted for almost a century. Politically, Britain could not afford to alienate either France or Russia, given its reliance on them for the system of global security which it had constructed. The fighting ceases at 11 am on 11 November which for Britain, France and America The Allies also, especially after identified themselves with such universal principles as democracy and national self-determination while the German war effort had only a narrow national appeal. The British Empire is also dragged into the conflict and the war in Europe starts to expand across the globe.
